The dominating theory within the area of organization and leadership since the times of the classical theories of organization, i.e. the so called "one best way" theory, has during the last thirty years been challenged by an alternative theory, i.e. the theory of "context dependence". What this means is that what is regarded as good leadership varies with the context. One such context is culture, or to be more precise; national or regional culture. Today most books dealing with international business-related topics take the view that good leadership has to be "context specific". At the same time, some argue that the forces of Globalization will slowly reduce national cultural differences and pave the way for a global leadership style, while others argue that cultural differences will maintain or even grow as a reaction to the Globalization process. These are also among the issues that will be discussed during the course.

Geographically and culturally the Scandinavian countries form a distinct cluster. During this course, leadership, management and organization within this cluster will be in focus. The Scandinavian way of leading people and managing organizations will be explained and discussed, and will also be compared to other management styles. Also the challenges imposed by Globalization is an important issue. Among other relevant issues, business ethics in particular will be in focus.

Objective

The main objective of the course is to provide the students with insights and an understanding of what is perceived as particularly Scandinavian with reference to leading people and managing work organizations. Emphasize will also be on the issue of work conditions and work environment. In order to fully understand Scandinavian Management, the so called "Scandinavian Modell" will be discussed. Initially, theories of culture and cross-cultural management will be presented as they provide the best starting point for discussing a regional management-model like the Scandinavian one.
