Introduction

In the international business community, being able to read people is at least as important as being able to read a spreadsheet or a budget. Just as education in finance and accounting is needed to achieve numeracy, education in how people relate to each other and what values motivate their actions is necessary to achieve literacy in human interaction - the foundation of good leadership. The study of a culture's literature, learning to read between the lines, gives an almost first-hand experience of situations that allows us to come as close as possible to actually experiencing that culture's mores, business and otherwise. Norwegian literature presents us with a composite picture of this society's history, psychology, ethics, and sociology over time; reading Scandinavian leadership and management theory in conjunction with this literature sheds even more light on Norwegian values, management practices, leadership style, and gender roles. Using this combination of sources, the course will monitor the evolution of Norwegian values, from their Viking roots to the feminine society of 21st century Norway - and view these values from a managerial perspective. Being able to use a culture's literature to gain in-depth understanding about that culture will make our students more well-rounded individuals, better able to learn about and thus do business not only in Norway, but also in other cultures they will encounter in their future careers.

Learning outcome

Acquired knowledge

After completed course should have:

- Learned how basic elements of Norwegian/Scandinavian leadership style are reflected in a selection of Norwegian literature that portrays Norwegian value patterns over time.
- Learned how the actions of present-day Norwegian public figures - organisational leaders and politicians - relate to these values patterns.
- Refined their independent research capabilities through group assignments and researching Norwegian business leaders/politicians.

Acquired skills

After completed course students will be able to:

- Interpret management and leadership texts as well as analyze literary texts.
- Make connections between Norwegian business leaders/politicians, their leadership styles and the values presented by course literature.
- Use their creative abilities and do independent research; write literature of their own reflecting course material and focusing on a selection of Norwegian leaders - men and women.

Reflection

This course should whet our students' appetites, inspiring them to turn to literature, Norwegian and other, as a source of intellectual and emotional challenge and enlightenment. Students should be able to reflect upon how powerful a mirror literature holds up to a society, and be motivated to apply their analytical skills to and learn from other literature, about other cultures.

Learning process and workload

Students will attend lectures and view selected films in connection with the reading list. They must have read the literature assignment before coming to class and be prepared to discuss it. Guest lecturers will bring added insight into these discussions. Students will work in groups to prepare 3 assignments which involve independent research on assigned present-day Norwegian businesspeople and politicians. They will be asked to present their research and then to write a "short story" centered on this character in which they bring the Norwegian values into play which have been identified in the course.
